

Increasing Infectious Hepatitis Gives Health Officials Concern

The increase in the number of cases of infectious hepatitis in Los Angeles county is the cause of considerable concern among public health officials since it spreads so easily from person to another.

Formerly little noted, it was brought dramatically to public attention during World War II when 300,000 American servicemen were laid low with a virus infection that attacked the liver.

Turned out to be a form of jaundice—something that had been around sporadically for generations; indeed, it is estimated that probably five per cent of the population of the United States has suffered from it at one time or another.

Several Names

In regards to nomenclature, infectious hepatitis seems almost untidily prolific. Names given include infectious or epidemic jaundice, viral, infectious or epidemic hepatitis, and also two seldom used terms, yellow or catarrhal jaundice. For comes the overall yellow coloration characteristic of jaundice which is caused by the backing-up of the bile pigments in the liver. This business may last from three days to four months, but in the average case starts clearing up in a couple of weeks. Only in rare cases does the disease progress to "deep jaundice" with resultant atrophy of the liver followed by death.

Children and young adults, generally under 35 years of age, are most frequently stricken. On the other hand, without any signs of illness, very young children may be carriers of the virus and so infect individuals with whom they come in close contact.

Germ Transfer

Infectious hepatitis is transmitted chiefly through careless personal hygiene. The virus is present in the intestinal contents and perhaps in discharges from the nose and mouth. Through excreta or contaminated hands the germs may be transferred to food and water. Infectious hepatitis is difficult to diagnose especially when the typical jaundiced color is absent. Nor is the yellowness, if present, always due to this cause. It may result from other maladies including gallstones or other obstruction in the bile duct.

Research on the disease goes forward slowly since all animals are apparently immune to the disorder and cannot be used in experimentation. Work must, therefore, be done on human guinea pigs. However, it is known that an attack of infectious hepatitis does not provide immunity against serum hepatitis although apparently recurrent attacks of the same type are prevented.

Sanitation Advised

Prevention of infectious hepatitis depends a great deal on good environmental sanitation and strict personal cleanliness. If exposure does occur, the administration of Gamma Globulin, already used successfully in checking institutional outbreaks, gives protection.
